THE DOMAIN NAME SHUFFLE

Chicago Tribune (CT) - THURSDAY, August 27, 1998

TEXT:

...Final Debug: One of my 10 million jobs at my company is organizing the domain names we own. I'm told that the naming system is about to change and that some browsers will handle this in different ways. What's the situation? -- B. Klein, Chicago Final Debug Responds: If you're unsure of what's happening with domain names, you're far from alone. There are two major issues to consider. First, there's the issue of the basic organizing structure of domain names. Most knowledgeable observers agree that the current naming structure is insufficient, especially as the demand for domain names increases. Various industry and government attempts to remedy this (and break the InterNic's monopoly on assigning domain names) have not been successful. Alternate naming schemes advocated by groups like the AlterNic also have not been successful. But relief may be on the horizon. Earlier this week, the Internet Assigned Names Authority (IANA) issued the third draft of a proposal to form a new group to...

...tried to create a proposal that would potentially be accepted by all parts of the Internet community. "We hope...(that the proposal) will protect the legitimate interests of the millions of individuals...

...to directly participate in it," he said. The second issue being considered in the domain name debate is browser compatability. For example, the next version of Netscape's browser (4.5) will include a function called SmartQuery which is unsettling to some domain name holders. Instead of having to type in an entire domain name for popular sites, a user just has to type in the name. For example, instead of www.microsoft.com, a user can type microsoft. But this feature does not make one's life easier all the time. When a user types scripting he doesn't get www.scripting.com, he gets a list of programming...

...inconsistent, unclear, and likely to be used by Netscape to garner advertising income. Some domain name holders have complained and already forced some minor changes. Netscape officials emphasize that SmartQuery is still in beta testing and therefore is not a finished product.

...prevalent are virtual offices? Two years ago, when we completed our survey of large US companies, virtual offices of one type or another were quite popular, and becoming more so. At that time about 30 per cent of these companies had...

...Many more companies allowed occasional telecommuting on an informal basis. My informal analysis since then suggests that the number of virtual workers continues to increase companies committed to virtual offices are rolling them out to more locations, and more informal programmes are taking effect. But the rate of adoption of formal programmes has slowed. Like Chiat/Day, a few companies have abandoned virtual offices altogether. The industries that made the greatest use of virtual work in our study...

...Bell, Hewlett-Packard, Compaq, Xerox), which had a reason to showcase the use of its products, and the professional services industry. The consumer products industry (Frito-Lay, Procter & Gamble) was also active because its sales forces travelled frequently to...

And just as companies operating offline seek to stretch their brands into new product areas, so the new generation of online companies are doing the same. Amazon, for example, moved into CDs and videos in June and already claims to be the largest online retailer in music sales. In August it bought PlanetAll, a web-based address book, calendar and reminder service, and Junglee, a web site which helps consumers find the cheapest products on the world wide web. And it has reserved domain names which suggest it is looking at digital tele-vision. Conventional retailers such as supermarket chains are also...
